But in the pathogenesis are included effects observed on those engaged in petroleum works, and those who use “paraffin oil” in various trades; it would therefore be well to have also a preparation of the crude, non-rectified liquid. The affections met with in petroleum extractors and refiners are: diseases of the skin and subcutaneous tissue; depressed nutrition, anaemia, dyspepsia, nerve troubles, irritability, insomnia, respiratory affections. In addition to these is a species of intoxication, such as the singular effect of making some of the workmen insane: Desire to kill; hallucinations, they will see things not actually visible; for instance, “they will see the rails in a station when a train is on them.” Boys [who are much affected] will jump at a straight wall and try to scramble up it.
